Americans are gearing up to travel, but are approaching the new year with relatively conservative travel spending expectations. Our national survey of leisure travelers shows that while reduced prices at the pump are encouraging more trips by car, last summer’s tightened airport security measures are still frustrating travelers and constraining air travel.

The outlook for domestic leisure travel remains strongly positive. According to our survey of 1,022 Americans, the typical leisure traveler is planning to increase the number of leisure trips they will take in the next 12 months. The survey found that the average adult took 5.7 leisure trips in the past year. Approximately 41% of these travelers expect to take more leisure trips in the upcoming year, while only 7.3% expect to travel less. By comparison, when the same survey was conducted in July 2006, only 33% of Americans expected to take more leisure trips in the upcoming year.

Spending on leisure travel is also likely to remain strong and stable. In fact, 42.0% of Americans say they expected to spend more on their leisure travel in the upcoming year, compared to the year immediately past. This figure decreased only slightly in our current survey, from 44.1% in July.

Travel Trends

Some interesting facts found in the survey

Among air travelers, 39.3% say that the overall convenience of domestic air travel has gotten “worse” or “much worse” in the past year, up from only 26.8% last July. This is troubling as 15.7% of air travelers say that in the past year they have experienced issues in airports will make them less likely to travel by air in the future.

Good budgeting and leisure travel do not necessarily go hand-in-hand. Over 62% of leisure travelers say that they have spent more than they expected on a leisure trip during the last 12 months.

Almost 32% say that they have taken a laptop computer with them on a leisure trip during the past year. Approximately one-in-five (20.4%) say they have used a PDA or handheld device to access travel information.

Travel is indeed still a social activity for Americans. Over 68% of travelers visited friends or relatives and 30% say they made new friends while on leisure trips in the past year. Interestingly, 11.4% of respondents told us that they had traveled at least once in the past year specifically to spend time away from someone.

Food and travel are still inseparable; and for many, regional cuisines are an important part of a successful vacation. About 45% of leisure travelers say that regional cuisines are “important” or “very important” to the destinations they choose to visit.

While enthusiasm for travel remains strong, and Americans are planning to travel, it is clear that travelers have yet to fully adapt to increased transportation prices and inconveniences related to air travel. Between the last two surveys, concern about gasoline prices has abated slightly, but still is a threat to the industry. In January, over 40.1% of leisure travelers said that high gasoline prices had led them to travel less in the past year than they would have preferred. While this figure is down from 47.3% in July, it is still significant.

While the automobile remains the most common mode of travel, an airline was used at least once by over half (59.6%) of leisure travelers in the past year. About 28% of leisure travelers say the high price of airfare has caused them to curtail their travels in the past 12 months. Over 15% say that problems they have experienced with air travel will make them less likely to travel by air in the future.

Our July 2006 survey was taken just prior to last summer’s increased air security resulting from the foiled plot to blow up transatlantic jets. In January 2007, 39.4% of travelers said that they had experienced excessive security line waits—up from 30.6% in July—and 22.2% said they had experienced check-in difficulties, up from 14.3% in July. Fully 15% of respondents said they had experienced having to throw away at least one item in order to pass through an airport security checkpoint.
THE WEB SAVVY TRAVELER

Our survey explored how Americans use the Internet to make travel decisions. It is clear that the Internet has moved well beyond being a tool for booking flights and hotel rooms. Travelers use it extensively to help with the complete range of decisions involved in trip planning. Over 41% say that they have used the Internet to select the activities and attractions they will see and do on a trip. Almost 40% have used the Internet to select a specific destination to visit. In fact, about one-in-three say that they have used the Internet to decide how long they would stay in a destination.

Web 2.0 is coming of age in the travel realm. About a third of leisure travelers (31.0%) say that in the past year they have used reviews of hotels posted by their fellow travelers to plan their trips. About a quarter (25.9%) say that they have read user generated travel reviews of destinations. However, some newer technologies appear to be just gaining a foothold. Specifically, in the past year 13.1% of leisure travelers have used online video to help plan a trip, 6.8% have used audio files such as podcasts and 3.0% have used RSS feeds.

Methodology

The State of The American Traveler Survey is conducted every six months by Destination Analysts, Inc, a San Francisco-based tourism industry research company. The survey was conducted online amongst a nationally representative sample of adult Americans. From January 8th to 15th, surveys were collected from a group of respondents who were then screened by their leisure travel behavior. Only those respondents who had traveled at least once in the past 12 months for purely leisure or personal reasons were interviewed. This travel must have been of at least 50 miles one-way—the standard distance threshold used in the tourism industry to signify that a "trip" has been taken. In total, 1,022 leisure travelers completed the survey. With this sample size, the topline data presented here can be considered to have a reliability of +/- 3.1%.
