

THE STATE OF THE AMERICAN TRAVELER

Gas Prices and Economy Dampen Leisure Travel Outlook

Our latest travel opinion survey shows soaring gas prices and personal financial concerns may seriously impact the industry in the months to come. The July survey of 1,014 adult leisure travelers shows that Americans are taking fewer trips, while reigning in their expectations for future travel and spending. These research findings highlight the importance of travel organizations reviewing their 2008/09 plans and taking a proactive, responsive and likely more tactical approach to their marketing activities. The US travel market has changed. When compared to an identical survey taken 6 months prior, leisure travelers reported a decrease of 7.3 percent in the number

Hitting the Brakes?

The State of the American Traveler Survey also monitors traveler sentiment by tracking the issues people perceive as having kept them from traveling. Clearly, gasoline prices and personal financial concerns are the most important issues impeding leisure travel. None of the other factors tested compare. In our most recent survey, gasoline prices continued to be cited by a growing majority of travelers (57.8%) as a factor that kept them from traveling as much as they would have preferred.

Close behind gas prices is "personal financial reasons", which has leveled off at 49.5%, after growing for two consecutive years. The rising cost of airfare is also a growing concern, with 35.2% of respondents saying ticket prices have led them to cut back on leisure travel in the past year.

In this edition we wanted to dig deeper into how exactly Americans adapt their travel behaviors to changing economic climates.

The survey first asked respondents to identify the different ways in which they might have changed their travel specifically in response to gasoline prices. About half (47.2%) said they have actually reduced the number of leisure trips taken in the past year due to gasoline prices. Just under a third (29.9%) said they had shortened the distance traveled on a trip to save money. A similar proportion (29.0%) actively looked for travel bargains or discounts. Rising gasoline prices appear to have had a more limited impact on destination choice: only 14.5% of survey respondents said that this led them to select generally less expensive destinations to visit.

of trips they have taken in the past year. Meanwhile the percent expecting to decrease the number of trips they will take and their spending on these trips both rose dramatically. In total, 28.8% of leisure travelers now say they will travel less frequently in the upcoming year, nearly triple the 10.5% figure seen last January. Almost a third of travelers (29.8%) are planning to decrease their travel spending in the next year, up from 12.6% just six months ago.

These sobering statistics are likely to be counter-balanced, however, by exchange rate driven growth in international arrivals and more domestic travel closer to home. While recent increases in foreign travel to America are well-documented and much talked about, our survey for the first time shows that nearly one quarter of domestic leisure travelers (23.6%) have taken a so-called "staycation" (a vacation taken at home) in the past year. While one data point does not a trend make, we believe it does highlight the opportunity and potential for destinations to market themselves closer to home. In fact, the survey shows that Americans are planning to use a number of ways to respond to the current economic pressures, including actively looking for travel discounts and bargains (53.3%), shortening the distance of their trips (34.9%) and reducing the number of days spent on trips to save money (25.4%).

Travel & Technology

Our survey vividly illustrates the importance to destination marketers of a compelling web presence that can be found by potential visitors. Travelers not only use Internet content for researching and buying travel product, but to select their actual travel destinations. Fully 39.7% of respondents said that in the past 12 months they had decided to visit a particular destination based on information found online. Additionally, one in four (25.1%) said that they had decided how long to stay in a particular destination based on information found online.

Meanwhile, destination marketing organizations' penetration into the set of websites used in travel planning is moderate. In the past 12 months, less than a third (27.5%) of leisure travelers used the website of a local convention & visitors bureau (or chamber) to help plan a trip. Even fewer respondents (19.1%) report using the website of an official state travel office.

As has been noted in previous editions of the study, advanced Internet technologies (such as Web 2.0 applications) are under utilized in the travel realm. Many such resources that are extremely popular in general Internet use have yet to find traction in travel planning. For example, online travel videos were used by only 8.8% of survey respondents to help plan a leisure trip in the past year. User-generated reviews of restaurants or activities were used in travel planning by only 15.8% of travelers. Surprisingly, however, almost one in five respondents (17.2%) said they have used a mobile phone/PDA to access travel information in the past 12 months.

In the past 12 months, which of these resources or Internet technologies have you used to specifically help plan your leisure travel?

Methodology The State of The American Traveler Survey is conducted every six months by Destination Analysts, Inc, a San Francisco-based tourism industry research company. The survey was conducted online amongst a nationally representative sample of adult Americans. From June 27th to 30th, surveys were collected from a group of respondents who were then screened by their leisure travel behavior. Only those respondents who had traveled at least once in the past 12 months for purely leisure or personal reasons were interviewed. This travel must have been of at least 50 miles one-way—the standard distance threshold used in the tourism industry to signify that a “trip” has been taken. In total, 1,014 leisure travelers completed the survey. With this sample size, the topline data presented here can be considered to have a reliability of +/- 3.1%.

The State of the American Traveler

Suggested Keynote

Go inside the mind of the American leisure traveler, with this entertaining, customized keynote. The American leisure travel market is rapidly evolving. The Internet, Web 2.0, safety concerns, gasoline prices, and changing product offerings have all collided in recent years to create a new and ever-shifting travel landscape. Using data collected in its bi-annual survey of leisure travelers, Destination Analysts will make sense of these changes and help your group move forward with confidence.

Measure, Monitor, Then Manage: The Essentials of Web Analytics and Online Research

Unless you are measuring you can't manage. This information rich session will provide an overview of the tools, methods and options in measuring and researching your online customers. Your websites and e-mail marketing programs should be providing critical information that your DMO managers can access, interpret and use. Cutting through the technology jargon, this session will teach you the why, how and what to do next. We will explain online research options and discuss how DMOs can use these techniques to gain the clarity and direction needed to effectively develop, manage and track the results of their Web sites and electronic promotions.

Research-Based Web Design: Making Your Website Meet Your Users Needs

If you're like most destinations, your website is now your most important marketing tool. Internet users are primarily task-oriented and will quickly leave a website that fails to immediately address their needs. Have you studied your website visitor to find out what they really want from your website? Do you know what will keep them on your website and create true stickiness? In this informative session, we will show you how to find out what your visitors want and shape your website to fit their needs. A tutorial on website usability testing will end this exciting and interactive session.

Food, Wine & Travel: A Perfect Pairing

Suggested Keynote

Culinary tourism is often portrayed as the latest "trend" in destination marketing, but is really one of the oldest and potentially most lucrative leisure travel niche market. In this revealing session we give you an inside look at so-called "foodie" travelers or culinary tourists. How are they psychographically different from other travelers and how can your destination tap this affluent, high-spending market?

Accountability Research 101: Measuring the Value of Your Marketing Programs

Destination marketers are under increasing pressure to show the return on investment of their sales and marketing activities to their communities. In this fast-paced and content rich session, you will learn the basics of how to measure the economic impact of your programs. Case studies and how-to examples will be presented on websites, visitor guides, tourism magazines and e-mail campaigns. You'll also get tips for effectively communicating to stakeholders and the media the value your works bring to your destination.

Guerilla Research: A Beginners Guide to Conducting Affordable and Effective Market Research

Smaller destinations face the same pressure to make hard decisions and justify their expenditures as large one. Yet, to these many small destinations market research is perceived as expensive and out of reach. In this one-hour session, you will learn the basics of conducting reliable and cost-effective research in-house. The session will leave you with a treasure trove of ideas for research with the highest impact to your organization and new ideas for minimizing and sharing research costs.

Research Products for DMOs

Destination Analysts has developed numerous ready-to-implement research solutions specifically for destination marketing organizations. While each solution is well-tested, every study is customized for your individual DMO's needs.

Website Usability Testing

Usability research gathers rich feedback on website user behavior to develop a deep understanding of the "whys" behind your web analytics. A particularly critical step in website redesign/re-launch, this study gauges users' emotional response, tests users' understanding of finding the information they seek, and identifies key areas of improvement.

Return on Investment Studies

The ability to quantify the return to your community of your organization's marketing efforts lends enormous power to clarifying strategy, and justifying funding maintenance or expansion. Destination Analysts can conduct conversion research on your website, visitors guide, advertising programs, events and other promotions, even convention/meetings sales and marketing efforts.

Economic Impact Analysis

With the political uncertainty faced by DMOs, having reliable data on the financial return the tourism industry brings to the community is crucial. Destination Analysts economists can provide a customized, comprehensive study of the economic impact of tourism, which includes all related facets—from visitor volume to jobs supported—and provides important benchmarking for the future.

Brand Audits & Branding Research

An imperative first step for both short and long term marketing strategy planning, a brand audit develops a clear picture of the essential elements that comprise your destination's brand and its core values. Branding research can also help measure your brand against its competitive set, and identify your destination's most lucrative target markets to develop specific selling points for each.

Meeting Planner Studies, Meetings Market Research & Competitive Analysis

A variety of research can be implemented to increase meetings business including studying meeting planners' motivations in the destination decision; identifying competition and providing comparison metrics on key attributes that meeting planners seek in a meetings destination; and quantifying the economic impact to the local economy.

Advertising Effectiveness & Tracking Studies and Advertising Concept Testing

To understand the full value of your advertising program, this study will measure ad recall and brand recognition and, most importantly, demonstrate how the advertising affected visitor behavior. Advertising concept testing can also be introduced to understand how ad creative fares with your target audience before costly media investment.

Traditional Focus Group Research & Online In-Depth Interviews

Qualitative research provides the color and depth of understanding to our informational pursuits. Whether you need potential visitors' responses to new marketing messaging or meeting planners opinions on your new online meetings tools, our seasoned facilitators can help seek out the valuable feedback you need.
